

Editor's Note

Resuming academic research and publication after the new normal and after the economic downturn in Sri Lanka has not been easy. Especially, the language research gained slow momentum during the last two years. The reasons for this are complex but LOGOS managed to release its second volume on time.

LOGOS has been the main platform for language and literature related publications in the Department of Languages as well as in the Sabaragamuwa University of Sri Lanka. Our aim was to make it available for wider Sri Lankan audience and researchers from humanities who struggle to publish their findings in a local platform. Slowly but steadily, we are reaching that destination but still we have a long way to go.

I am thankful for all the authors who provided their manuscripts and were patiently waiting for the publication of this volume. I am sure that this volume carries a substantial amount of research papers which may invite serious academic dialogue.

This time, much like the last time, this issue was made possible because of the tireless effort made by the coordinating editor, Dr. Noel Dassanayake who did all the logistic and formatting work to make it presentable like this.

The Dean, FSSL was keen to launch this on time and I must thank him for the various supports given and I must thank the Head, Languages for the constant encouragement while also thanking the FSSL IT team for the web support.
